Historical Photographs of the Middle East
Middle East Photographs

Photographs are of great value in scholarly research as historical - and artistic - documents. IDC therefore endeavours to publish photographic archives on microfiche, which is the only practical and economic way for large collections. The photographic archive in the Middle East Centre of St. Antony's College, Oxford, consists of over 60,000 photographs, and covers most of the Middle East. A selection of over 16,000 of these photographs is now published by IDC. This collection will be of interest to - among others - the historian, the archaeologist, the anthropologist, and the art historian.

The development of photography in the Middle East

The photographic documentation of the Middle East began soon after the announcement of the daguerreotype process in 1839. The pioneers of the new art of photography came mostly from Europe, and, on the whole, concentrated their efforts on the monumental antiquities of Egypt and on those areas of Palestine with biblical associations. Their photographs became popular in Europe, and by the 1860's a number of professional photographers had opened studios in the Middle East in order to take advantage of the increasing demands of the tourist market for momentos of local sites. Studios were set up in Istanbul, Cairo, Port Said, Beirut, Damascus and Jerusalem where firms such as Arnoux, Bonfils, Lekegian and Sébah and Joailler produced hundreds of photographs of important buildings and antiquities. Large numbers of these photographs were brought back to Europe by travellers and missionaries, and although many have been lost or destroyed over the years, several important collections have survived and are now preserved in archives and libraries in Europe and America.

During the latter part of the nineteenth century developments in the techniques of photography encouraged more amateurs to take their own photographs. These early enthusiasts turned their cameras to a larger area and a wider variety of subjects than the studio photographers; it was during the 1870's and 1880's for instance that the first photographs of the Hijaz were taken by Muhammad Sadiq and Dr. al Said abd al Ghaffar.

By the 1890's George Eastman's simple snapshot camera had brought photography within the range of everyone. Travellers now began to carry their own cameras, as did the growing number of European army officers, administrative officials and missionaries who worked in the Middle East during and after the first world war. The photographs they took were primarily a record of personal experience, but many amateurs also recorded facets of everyday life which might have been ignored or distorted by the professional photographer who always had, of necessity, an eye to the market.

The Photographic Archive of the Middle East Centre, Oxford

The development of photography in the Middle East outlined above can be traced through the photographic archive of the Middle East Centre in Oxford, which is probably one of the largest single collections of historical photographs of the Middle East in Britain.

The archive grew out of the Private Papers collection, which was begun in 1961 by Elizabeth Monroe and Albert Hourani with the aim of locating, preserving, and making accessible all kinds of records dealing with British achievement in the Middle East.

The archive now contains over fifty photographic collections made up of albums, lantern slides, negatives, and thousands of loose prints, dating from the 1850's to the 1960's, and covering most areas of the Middle East.

Donors have included: all ranks of public servant, from ambassadors and high commissioners such as Sir Harold Macmichael and Sir Andrew Ryan, to district officers, teachers and members of the police service; travellers such as Harry St. John Philby; journalists such as Owen Tweedy and Colonel J.B. Slade-Baker; and the Jerusalem and East Mission, whose collection is one of the largest at the Centre and contains some of the earliest photographs.

The photographs which make up these collections cover a wide variety of subjects; archaeology, architecture, the development of major towns and cities, portraits of rulers, historic meetings, official events, military history, industrial development, education, medical services, missionary work, the social, religious and cultural life of the region, and the British at work and at play.

The Catalogue

The catalogue, which lists the individual photographs, is divided by area. Within each area the photographs are listed alphabetically by collection.

The photographs have been numbered consecutively throughout each area, and the microfiche numbers indicate where a new microfiche starts.

Personal names and place names have been verified wherever possible, and every attempt has been made to be consistent in the transliteration of Arabic names.

The three indexes at the end of the catalogue: by personal name, place name and subject, will further assist the user in locating specific photographs.

The Microfiche Edition

All photographs and slides in this collection have been reproduced on black and white, halftone microfiches, silverhalide safety film according to international standards, which guarantees archival quality. The microfiche numbers are listed in the catalogue for easy reference.

The microfiches are also available from IDC by region or individual fiche. Since St. Antony's College holds the original collection, users are requested to write to the Archivist, The Middle East Centre, if they require copy prints.

The collection is stored in a luxury plastic binder with dust cover. This project is one of a series of similar ones, and the aim is to make major historical photograph collections available in this inexpensive and space saving way.
